December 2024

Monthly investment update

In November, the US presidential election ended with Donald Trump securing a decisive victory, claiming key swing states early. The Republican Party gained control of Congress, paving the way for Trump's agenda, including tariffs, deregulation, corporate tax cuts, and immigration restrictions.

Whilst Trump's cabinet appointments raised eyebrows, reflecting unconventional policy approaches, markets reacted positively. US equities and the dollar rallied post-election, driven by optimism around Trump's pro-growth policies and strong corporate earnings. The Russell 2000 rose 11% in November, while the S&P 500 gained nearly 6%, led by healthcare, IT, and communication services. However, commodities, like copper and oil, fell on global growth concerns.

November was a good month for equities, especially as we saw broader participation from stocks across sectors and not just the Magnificent 7. Going forward, fiscal policies globally will continue to play an important role in shaping market trades. As always, we continue to monitor geopolitical risks when constructing portfolios, with a focus on quality companies able to withstand political turbulence.
